Daniel Wu represents banks and other financial institutions in complex commercial litigation, as well as business entities involved in high-stakes intellectual property disputes. His clients include national and regional banks, financial institutions, major related corporations, software companies, and a diverse array of businesses across many different industries.

Daniel prioritizes his clients' business and economic considerations, handling litigation with a straightforward method that includes:

- Conducting a thorough investigation and developing sound legal theories early
- Helping the client define and refine their business goals
- Pursuing negotiation and settlement discussions, and then if necessary, preparing and trying the case in a professional, focused manner

His experience includes bank operations, business torts, breach of contract, forgeries and alterations, organized crime schemes, unfair competition and unfair business claims, creditor's rights/bankruptcy, real estate based transactions and secured transactions. He has handled the prosecution and defense of complex breach of contract, fraud, unfair business competition, trade secret and business tort claims.

He also represents business entities in high-stakes patent and intellectual property litigation, using his background in science to navigate technically complex patent matters. He has successfully represented clients in the prosecution and defense of patent infringement and invalidity matters involving software, consumer products, mechanical devices, promotional products and medical devices. He has litigated complex trademark, copyright and misappropriation of trade secret matters.
